A Georgian and a New Country:

Ebenezer Platt's Imprisonment in Newgate for Treason in "The Year of the Hangman," 1777

By Robert S. Davis Jr.

On July 9, 1775, South Carolina and Georgia rebels converged on the British merchant ship Philippa. Unaware that royal authority in these colonies had been supplanted by rebellious Americans, the ship had arrived at Savannah, Georgia with a cargo that included several tons of munitions for southern colonial merchants. A source in Georgia had informed the Carolinians of the pending arrival of a ship laden with powder and shot for the British troops and as presents for the Indians. The Carolinians initiated a plan to seize that vessel but Georgia's new Provincial Congress also participated in the project. The latter purchased a schooner, renamed it the Liberty, and commissioned it as what Georgia historian Charles C. Jones deemed as the first privateer of the American Revolution. They gave command of the ship to Oliver Bowen and Joseph Habersham for the mission.

Flying a white flag, bordered in red that read "American Liberty," the schooner mistook the Philippa for the expected British government powder ship and chased it out to sea before using the threat of ten cannons and numerous swivel guns to force the Philippa to nearby Cockspar Island. There some three hundred rebels, flying their American Liberty flags, used two barges provided by South Carolina to board the ship. Over the protests of the captain, Richard Maitland, who had nearly suffered tar and feathering the previous year for trying to import the banned British tea into South Carolina, the rebels presented their orders from George Walton, secretary of the Georgia Provincial Congress, and seized the private cargo of powder. They also discovered that the ship carried a large quantity of small arms and shot. The Georgia Provincial Congress ordered the vessel brought up river to Savannah, where a committee composed of Mordecai Sheftall, Joseph Spencer, and Ebenezer Smith Platt took charge of the ship and the newly discovered arms and ammunition.

Of far more value to the American cause than the tea and other commercial commodities seized by various rebel groups, the powder and shot of the Philippa's cargo served the American cause well. Georgia, through South Carolina's council, sent 5,000 pounds of their portion of the powder to the Continental Congress in Philadelphia, which with 5,212 pounds of South Carolina's portion, supplied the Americans at the siege of Boston and in the invasion of Canada.

As with all else that occurred on that day, Ebenezer Smith Platt could not know the international ramifications of his presence on the ship. Born in 1753 in Smithtown, Long Island, New York, he came from a prominent family. His uncle, judge Zephariah Platt, founded Plattsburg, New York and served in the Continental Congress. Ebenezer's brother Richard served as an aide de camp to General Richard Montgomery in the American invasion of Canada. In his arms, Montgomery died. In 1774, Ebenezer, by then a New York watch and clock maker, advertised for an apprentice. In March of the following year, however, his father Jonas sent him to the South with a cargo of merchant goods and instructions to purchase a plantation. The younger Platt moved to Savannah, where he sold the cargo and bought some 5,000 acres of land. His father soon joined him and they began a venture to import slaves from Africa when the coming revolution closed British trade. His father died shortly thereafter.

By the time of his mother's arrival and sudden death in November 1775, Platt had embarked on a career as a merchant in the firm of Cuthbert & Platt, while involving himself in the politics of the coming revolution. Savannah's rebels elected him to their newly created Parochial Committee meeting at Tondee's Tavern. He actively worked with the committee to enforce, sometimes violently, the American ban on trade with the British. His activities eventually placed his name on the list of Georgians deemed traitors by Georgia's Loyalist colonial government. In January 1776, Platt loaded two ships to take to St. Nicholas to trade for more munitions for the Georgia rebels. Just outside his destination, the British warship Maidestone captured the vessel that carried Platt. Taken to Jamaica, Platt obtained the release of his vessel as English property with the requirement that he sell his cargo there. He encountered Captain Maitland and the two spent eight weeks together in relative camaraderie. During a drunken party, he left rather than drink "damnation to all Americans." In his absence, Maitland told of Platt's involvement in the Philippa affair. Upon learning what Maitland said, the governor ordered Platt brought before him. After an interview, he had the Georgia merchant released. However, as Platt tried to sail away from Jamaica in March 1776, sailors from the royal navy boarded the ship where he had taken passage and seized him and his black servant. They were imprisoned on the British ship Antelope for his aiding the Georgia rebels. Technically, the naval officers had him impressed as an able bodied seaman as an excuse for his confinement. A Jamaican court ordered him released but British Vice-Admiral Clark Gayton, fearing a law suit from Platt, kept the American imprisoned. Still in chains, Platt found himself moved from ship to ship to prevent his release by writ of habeas corpus. He sold his servant to raise money to pay for his necessities. During his captivity, he even spent time in a British warship in New York harbor. Eventually, he arrived in England, by way of several ships. Using a writ of habeas corpus, Platt finally forced British authorities to bring him ashore for trial on December 4, 1776. By then, he had spent eight months at sea in chains.

After spending two days in London's Clerkenwell Prison, Platt found himself before Sir John Fielding and Sir William Addington, justices of the peace of Middlesex County, on January 23, 1777. Witnesses brought to England to testify against Platt fled custody but two were recaptured and made depositions in private against the unlucky Georgian. Addington ordered Platt held for treason in Newgate, the prison that served Middlesex, London, and all courts above local jurisdiction.

Ebenezer Smith Platt had become a legal problem of enormous proportions. Did he stand before the English judicial system as an English citizen guilty of treason or as a civilian prisoner of war? Whichever course the courts took, what would be the consequences in America for loyal British subjects and for Americans later taken as prisoners? Were his actions on the Philippa acts of piracy against a commercial vessel or was he only a bystander engaged in legitimate political dissent or in treason unrelated to the fate of the Philippa? Did his seizure represent a legal arrest or an act of piracy and kidnapping by the British navy? When fully apprised of his rights as an Englishman, even a rebellious one, Platt petitioned the Lord Mayor of London, in lieu of habeas corpus, for trial. The plea brought him a hearing in the adjoining courthouse, known as "Old Bailey," where the court determined that it had no authority to try, release, or grant bail to Platt. An attorney for Platt argued for his trial before the Appellate Court of the King's Bench. The court refused on the grounds that should Platt be found guilty of treason and hanged, the American rebels would retaliate against loyal British subjects. A trial of Platt threatened to expose the scandal that the British navy had received orders in Jamaica to prey upon American commercial shipping months before Parliament legalized such seizures. Parliament had also now limited habeas corpus to requiring the permission of the King's Privy Council for persons held for treason. Platt's attorney argued unsuccessfully that this act exceeded the authority of Parliament.

Platt did not realize the depth of his troubles, despite having already spent months as a prisoner in chains. Newgate Prison's reputation for brutal and unsanitary conditions still finds a place in the annals of the worst prisons, especially for inmates without money and influence. Escapes from the prison frequently occurred but not by men held in chains. At the same time, without a legal means to force his trial or release, Platt risked staying an occupant of Newgate indefinitely. Growing economic and social unrest in England, made worse by the failing fortunes of the British military in America, did not offer him any hope of sympathy from His Majesty's increasingly inflexible authority.

Unbeknownst to the prisoner at Newgate, however, his peculiar situation drew powerful allies to his aid. American gazettes gave him the dubious distinction of being the first American civilian held as a prisoner for the civil crime of treason rather than as a captured prisoner of war. The press widely reported his plight. What had happened to him technically could happen to hundreds of thousands of Americans who provided any form of aid to the rebellion. The Georgia delegates to the Continental Congress successfully petitioned the Congress to request that Benjamin Franklin, the American representative in France, work for Platt's release.

Patience Lovell Wright, American wax worker (artist making busts), spy for the rebels, and high ranking socialite (she referred to the King and Queen by their first names), worked on behalf of Platt and the cause of all Americans being held in English prisons. Undoubtedly with her help, Platt used the major tool of the era for drumming up popular support. He issued a pamphlet promoting his cause. Wright also started a fund for supporting all American prisoners held by the British, although Platt appeared as the only named beneficiary. She wrote to her friend Benjamin Franklin, not yet contacted by Congress, with letters on Platt's behalf. By Platt's own admission, the governor of Newgate treated him well but even as powerful a political leader as John Wilkes failed to persuade the prison officials to take off his chains.

Franklin no doubt acted out of his friendship for Wright, but the same issues of the American papers that carried the news of Platt's arrest also reported on British attempts to have Franklin arrested and extradited to England. Except for French intractability, Franklin might well have joined Platt at Newgate. Aiding in this cause started Franklin on the road to obtain the freedom of all Americans held in English prisons.

"Wright's influence, pressure by critics of government policy in Parliament, and Franklin's efforts finally persuaded the Privy Council to allow Platt a release on bail. Platt married Wright's daughter Elizabeth on March 26, 1778. She had regularly visited Platt in jail, while accompanied by her mother, and had helped in winning Franklin's help in his cause. The couple then fled to France, where Franklin gave them thirty guineas with which to return to America. En route to the new United States, a British privateer captured Platt's ship, the New Friends of Charleston. He spent several months in Scotland as a prisoner on parole. By the end of 1778, he reached Philadelphia where he unsuccessfully petitioned the Continental Congress for the 100 pounds he had heard they had voted him as compensation for his troubles.

Platt's story does not have a particularly happy ending. He lived in New York for a time before, in 1785, being reported by his legal ward as having "absconded." He moved back to Georgia, but stayed only briefly before moving to Kentucky in the late 1780s where, by 1792, he worked as a clock and watchmaker in Lexington. His wife, a prominent wax worker in New York since 1787, died in Bordentown, New Jersey in 1792, leaving a will that made no mention of Platt. By 1804 he was bankrupt. Three years later, by then a resident of Baltimore, Maryland, he unsuccessfully petitioned Congress for a pension based upon his months of imprisonment. Old, sick, and impoverished, Platt also had a failed memory. Among his many errors, he referred to the ship that began his troubles as the "Magnacharta," the previous name of the Philippa. His date and place of death remain a mystery.

The tale of Ebenezer Smith Platt and his time at Newgate Prison raised issues in England and America on the rights of citizens and the definition of treason before English common law. The growing conflict in America still lacked legal definition when Platt found himself entrapped in the English legal system. Through the services of Patience Wright and her daughter, he won release by arguing his cause on justice rather than legalities. He thus saved himself from indefinite confinement in Newgate while the English legal system evolved in dealing with a conflict in America that grew from civil strife to armed rebellion to a world war between independent nations. His sufferings for the American cause earned him passing references in the early histories of Georgia and, in recent times, in the studies of Benjamin Franklin's relationship with Patience Wright. For most of the years since he unknowingly put himself in jeopardy by boarding the Philippa, he and his story became largely forgotten, even as an example of the complexities of his revolution.
