Coming Soon, Epilogue by Gore Vidal

Gore Vidal has some questions for Timothy McVeigh.

A puffed-up-and-proud-of-it writer, Vidal, 75, is one of five people selected by McVeigh to witness his execution on May 16.

Reached at his home yesterday in Ravello, Italy, Vidal said he didn't want to talk about McVeigh's macabre invitation, which has upset relatives of McVeigh's victims in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing. "Don't you think you should wait for my Vanity Fair article?" he asked. He is planning to watch McVeigh, 33, die and to write about it for the magazine.

Asked if he is concerned about looking vulturous or receiving negative popular criticism, Vidal replied: "I've never been concerned about public opinion."

The author -- best known for historical novels such as "Burr," about Aaron Burr, and outrageous fiction such as "Myra Breckinridge," about a transsexual -- struck up a correspondence with McVeigh after Vidal's story "The War at Home" appeared in Vanity Fair magazine in November 1998. The correspondence, he said, consisted of three or four letters apiece.

In the article, Vidal had argued that the Bill of Rights was under attack by the federal government as it waged "spurious wars against drugs and terrorism." Deep in the story, Vidal opined that McVeigh, a veteran of Persian Gulf War, suffered "from an exaggerated sense of justice" and that in Oklahoma City "he went to war pretty much on his own."

Despite criticism of his accepting McVeigh's invitation, Vidal said yesterday in the phone interview, "It's clear that, one, I am against the death penalty; two, I'm against the arbitrary killing of innocent people; and, three, I'm against the killing of innocent men and women at Waco and Ruby Ridge."

Vidal said he would leave it to his questioner to remind readers of the federal government's 1993 raid on the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Tex. -- which left 80 people dead, including 22 children -- and its 1992 raid at Ruby Ridge, Idaho, in which the FBI killed the wife and child of separatist Randy Weaver. After all, Vidal told the reporter, you live in "the United States of Amnesia."

"I had hoped to go out and interview him," Vidal said of McVeigh. "I'm not a journalist. I haven't interviewed anyone since Barry Goldwater in 1964." But last month Attorney General John Ashcroft decreed that inmates on death row cannot give face-to-face interviews.

Such a decision "was worthy of the Third Reich," Vidal complained. "How this can come out of the head of an attorney general who is a nobody is beyond me. It seems unconstitutional."

He and McVeigh "share many ideas in common," he said, but stressed: "I'm not, not, not talking about taking revenge on innocent people. Especially Oklahomans because they are the children of my grandfather's constituents."

Vidal's grandfather, Thomas Gore, was a U.S. senator from Oklahoma. Until he was 10, Vidal lived in his grandfather's home on Rock Creek Park, a house that is now the Malaysian Embassy. He recalled reading aloud to the elder Gore because the senator was blind. Gore Vidal said that though he never went to college, he did receive a great education at the feet of his grandfather.

Vidal, a veteran of World War II, also pointed out that he is a member of "the greatest generation."

McVeigh, Vidal said, is "very very bright." His spelling, his punctuation, his grammar "are perfect." And he "quotes, from memory, H.L. Mencken," Vidal said. "He is a junkie of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights."

As for his crime, McVeigh "knows what he did."

Vidal hoped to write a "summing up" story. Though he isn't allowed to meet McVeigh in person, Vidal said he was told he can speak to him for 15 minutes on the telephone. Owing to a deep dislike of telephony, Vidal hopes that McVeigh will use a fax instead. "I sent him a number of questions," Vidal said, "which I'm not going to tell you."

He would reveal one: He asked McVeigh why he chose to bomb a place "where innocents would be killed?"

"I guess he's going to write out his answers," Vidal said. "It may well be posthumously that I will hear from him."

The faxed exchange will serve "in lieu of a kind of wrap-up of our mysterious three-year relationship."

Vidal said, "He is a very superior sort of young man."

Notes for Robert Stewart, 1st Duke of Albany:

DUKES OF ALBANY ---- titled SCOTTISH nobility of several creations.

Robert Stewart, 1st Duke of Albany ---- (b. c. 1340----d. September 1420, Stirling Castle, Stirling Scotland), Regent of Scotland who virtually ruled SCOTLAND from 1388 to 1420, throughout the reign of his weak brother Robert III and during part of the reign of James I, who had been imprisoned in LONDON.

The third (3) son of Robert II of Scotland, he was made High Chamberlain of Scotland in 1382 and won a military reputation in campaigns against ENGLAND. Chosen guardian of SCOTLAND in 1388, he retained the control of affairs after his brother John became King as Robert III in 1390. In April 1398 he was created Duke of Albany (of the first (1) creation). In 1399, however, his nephew David, Duke of Rothesay, the heir to the crown, succeeded him as Governor. Uncle and nephew soon differed, and in March 1402 the latter died in prison at FALKLAND. While Albany and the Earl of Douglas were certainly responsible for the imprisonment of Rothesay, the cause of his death is unknown, though contemporary suspicion pointed to the uncle's guilt.

Restored to the office of Governor, the Duke was chosen Regent of the Kingdom after the death of Robert III in 1406, because the new King, James I, was a prisoner in LONDON. Albany continued, with no great success, to prosecute the war with ENGLAND, which had been renewed a few years before. Albany died at Stirling Castle and was buried in DUNFERMLINE ABBEY. His son, Murdac (or Murdoch) Stewart, succeeded him as 2nd Duke of Albany and Regent but was seized in 1425 on the orders of James I on unrecorded charges and tried and executed. The Dukedom of the first (1) creation became extinct.

101098562. Hringo (Earl Beorn), King of Upland

Notes for Hringo (Earl Beorn), King of Upland:

"THE ORIGINS OF THE ARMSTRONGS"

Where did the Armstrongs come from? What is their history?
When did they first arrive in the United States?
Where have the various branches of the family gone?

Although there is more than one story about the origins of the Armstrongs, perhaps one of the most widely accepted is the saga of Siward, The Viking, also known as Siward Fairbairn of the Strong Arm (see Reference Listing #1). Siward was the son of a Danish King and lived in England from about 995 till his death in 1056. In those days, the ruler of any small territory was a king, so exactly where his father, Hringo, King of Upland, also known as Earl Beorn, would fall on the yardstick of earthly royalty is not clear; however, at the very least, he would be considered of noble birth.

Whether Siward was born in England is also not known for certain. However, he was the first to carry the name of Armstrong and was listed in the History of England as having earned the right to the title of Earl of Northumbria (Northumberland) having been conferred the title by Edward the Confessor.

Siward, the Fairbairn, was said to be of giant-like stature and a strong man, blue-eyed, very fair with light hair and beard. The legend goes that Siward took ship and sailed with 50 of his men from Denmark, arriving at what is today called the Shetland Islands, where he is said to have encountered a dragon which he slew in single combat. Dragons, as most of us know, are mythical creatures which the dictionary states were first defined as a large serpent. He apparently got a kick out of killing serpents, as he put out to sea again and finally landed in Northumbria where he began looking for another one to fight with. Here he met an old man who he thought was his god, Odin, who told him he had already killed the dragon and for him, Siward, to sail southward to the mouth of the Thames river which could bring him to the wealthy city of London (one would think that there would have been plenty of serpents there). The old man then gave him a standard (flag) to carry which signified The Raven of Earthly Terror (Edgar Allen Poe must have read about our ancestor!). He was received by Edward the Confessor, the King of England, with much ceremony and was made many promises if he would stay with the King and help him fight to retain his kingship.

The following story about Siward has endured. One day, as he was leaving the court after an audience with King Edward, he was confronted by Tostig, Earl of Huntington, on a bridge, who insulted him by throwing dirt upon him. Siward took no offense at the time, but on confronting him on his return on the same bridge, the story goes that he decapitated Earl Tostig and carried his head back to the King. The King, being suitably impressed by this brawny warrior with violent tendencies, wisely awarded Siward the Earldom of Huntington in addition to Northumbria.

As Siward's reputation as a brave and valiant knight continued to increase, so also did the Kingdom of Edward continued to be visited by other Danes who held him and his people in much less esteem than did our good Siward. In fact, they became an ever-growing nuisance-- arriving by ship and plundering the eastern coast of England. As the most of the havoc they created was located in Westmoreland, Cumberland and Northumbria Counties, some wise soul counseled the King to put Siward in charge of defending this area. While perhaps properly descriptive if not overly flattering, it was reportedly stated that it was best that the little devil should be first exposed to the great devil.

Siward governed in peace the territory of Northumbria which extended from the Humber River to the Tweed River on the border of Scotland, and was greatly respected and loved by the Northumbrians who were chiefly of Danish extraction (better a Danish devil than an English saint?). He orchestrated several forays from Northumbria to the north and was successful in putting all territory under the command of the King of England.

The surname of Siward was Beorn (meaning bear) and relates to the Nordic legends of the Fairy Bear or Fay Bairn, from which the Border name of Fairbairn, originated. The name was applied to the stories of Siward and his father and were called the Fairy Bear Stories.

Siward had a sister (who's name is not known) who married Duncan, the King of Scotland from 1034-1040 AD. Prior to his death in 1056, Siward supported his nephew Malcolm, the rightful heir, against Shakespeare's famous King Macbeth of Scotland who had killed Malcolm's father King Duncan.

By 1070, the Battle of Hastings (1066) was over and England had been conquered by William of Normandy. Malcolm III had been on the Scottish throne since the death of Macbeth in 1057 and Siward has been dead since 1056. His first son, Osberne Bulax, was killed in the battle of Macbeth in 1054, some say by the hand of Macbeth, himself. Osberne is also said to have married the daughter of Lady Godiva. Siward's second son, Waltheof (which means forest thief - nice name!) is alternately in and out of favor with William the Conqueror. For example, his wife, Juditha, is a niece of William and in 1069 we find that King William restored the earldom of Northumbria to Waltheof. However, in 1076 he was betrayed by King William and brought to the outskirts of Westminster where he was beheaded.

Osberne Bulax had two sons named Siward Barn the Red and Siward Barn the White (Fairbeorn). Not much is known of Siward the Red, but it is known that Siward Barn the White became a refugee and fled to Scotland with many other men of distinguished renown including Edgar, the Atheling, the rightful King of England.

Waltheof left no male descendant. However, Matilda (called Maude), his daughter (after her first husband died) married King David I, the son of King Malcolm of Scotland and his wife Margaret, who was the sister of Edgar the Atheling mentioned above. Both the Scottish and English royalty have descended from Waltheof to the present day.

Malcolm III, the 85th King of Scotland greeted Siward Barn the White (his cousin) with great kindness, and together they fought against William the Conqueror, driving him out of Northumbria. An interesting story apparently involves Siward the White Fairbeorn during a battle against England. During this battle, King Malcolm's horse was killed under him partially crippling him and young Siward fought his way to the King's side. Passing his left arm around the King's body under his arms, he reportedly fought his way with a great sword through the enemy to a place of safety. For his courageous act he was knighted by the King, given land and a castle on the Scottish border, and from that time on was referred to as the Sword of the Strong Arm (or Armstrong). This was how he and his descendants came to inherit the lands of Mangerton in Liddesdale.

These lands, known as the Debateable Land, were disputed for centuries by both Scotland and England. As time went on they were protected by neither nation and, as the Armstrongs were of both Anglo and Danish descent, they were entirely different from the Celtic Clans of Northern Scotland. As a result of blood ties and loyalties not unlike those of the Mafia in Sicily some centuries later, these Clans avenged blood for blood for centuries. In this environment it is not hard to understand how a reputation for plundering, bloodshed, and violence came to be tied to these marauders of the border lands.

Little is said about the Armstrongs after the building of the Mangerton Tower, probably in 1135. Apparently no Chief was immediately recognized until 1300 when Alexander became the first Lord of Mangerton. Stories abound of the enmity between the Armstrongs and their neighbors the Lords of Soulis. For example, Alexander, the second Lord of Mangerton, was treacherously killed by William, Lord Soulis, after being invited to a feast at his castle. The Armstrong Clan flourished, however, and by the early 1500s, the Laird of Mangerton was able to gather 3,000 mounted fighters. One Scottish king said that while there were Armstrong and Elliots on the Border, Scotland was safe. The Armstrongs were ambassadors, earls, knights, farmers and above all, fighters. For example, Gilbert Armstrong, third son of Alexander, the second Lord of Mangerton, a distinguished clergyman and diplomat was the Canon of Moray from 1361 to 1375. In 1363 he served as a Commissioner to England for the ransom of King David II of Scotland who was held as a prisoner in England. In all there were ten Lords of Mangerton from Alexander through Archibald Armstrong who was denounced as a rebel in 1603, deprived of his lands in 1610, and executed at Edinburgh.

What happened to change our fortunes so greatly? James IV of Scotland was on good terms with the Scottish Border chiefs and he regularly visited and was entertained by them. His son, James V of Scotland, on the other hand, ruled by decree from distant Edinburgh and did little to protect his Border subjects or support them against repeated English incursions. In fact, in 1530, James V, with some 8000 men at arms surged into the borderlands and the betrayal of the Armstrongs began. Johnnie Armstrong, Laird of Gilknockie, was a much beloved and highly respected member of the Armstrong Clan, who James V invited to parlay. Accepting the King's invitation, he and 50 of his men went to meet with the King in good faith. Instead, they were seized and summarily executed. This incendiary act outraged the Armstrongs and their allies and set the Borders ablaze with rage and indignation-- increasing the violence and bloodshed it was intended to suppress. At the prodding of the King, the Church also entered the fray and the Armstrong's and other Border reivers were cursed by the Church excommunicated enmasse. The Armstrongs, with other Borderers, were thus left to their own devices so far as mutual self-defense was concerned.

Receiving neither aid nor comfort from the Scottish or from the English Crowns, the Armstrongs and other Border clans were forced to become makers of their own laws and protection. After Edward I of England slaughtered thousand of Scots at Berwick, self-defense and preservation became their paramount endeavor. The Borderers were forced to become the best in what had become a profession - a greater thief (raider) did never ride was one complimentary description of an Armstrong, Jock O'Syde, in Liddesdale. They would raid by night and attend Carlisle Market by day, greeted by all who knew them. Unable to do more than bare subsistence farming, the cupboard was frequently bare. When the lady of the house served her Laird a pair of spurs on a plate, this meant it was time to ride and raid the other side of the Border yet again.

The bloodshed and violence continued. In 1603, Elizabeth I died and James VI of Scotland (James I of England) was declared her heir. After a splendid coronation at Westminster Abbey, James settled down to life at the English Court. One of his highest priorities was the suppression of the Border families like the Armstrongs, as he was afraid that their incursions would make him unpopular in England. As a result, he established powerful landlords in the Debateable Land around Liddesdale and Eskdale, and appointed Sir William Cranston to put to death all within two miles of the Border. A large number of Armstrong reivers were tortured and hung at the Market Cross in Edinburgh, at Carlisle and no doubt on a number of local gibbets. The last Armstrong raid of any importance took place in 1611 and for it, Lance Armstrong of Whithaugh - along with others - was executed a year later. Cranston generated the first forced migrations to Ireland and the subsequent Undertaking of the Plantation of Ulster in 1608. In the 18th century, farms were merged and more migrations followed.

The Armstrong lands of Mangerton passed into the hands of the Buccleuchs. Many members of the once powerful Armstrong Clan were shipped off to Ireland, including Johnnie Armstrong's grandson, William who settled in Fermanagh. Thus, many who had survived found themselves on the Solway shore waiting for emigrant ships to take them from an inhospitable homeland. Homeless, leaderless, and sometimes penniless, they went westward to Ireland and North America, and south to Australia and New Zealand in search of new beginnings. Perhaps the most famous descendent of the Fermanagh Armstrongs was Neil Armstrong, the American astronaut and the first human to set foot on the moon during the Apollo 11 mission in 1969.

The dissolution and dispersal of the Armstrongs followed some two hundred years of Border brigandage and treachery, ending in the depopulated areas and vast estates of the present day Whithaugh, Mangerton and Gilknockie, which had at one time been the Clan's greatest strongholds. A proud and courageous family had been reduced to a smattering of broken men. The Armstrongs have been scattered and now have neither chief nor recognized leader. However, as individuals the Armstrongs have survived and have lived up to their clan motto of "Invictus Maneo" or "We Remain Unvanquished."

Notes for William ("The Conqueror"), King of England-1066:

Known as "the Bastard" and later as "the Conquerer", he was born in C. 1024 at Falaise Castle in Normandy. He succeeded his father as Duke of Normandy on 22nd July 1035, despite his illegitimate status, as Duke Robert had no legitimate son. William became Count of Maine by right of conquest in 1063. He defeated Harold at the Battle of Hastings (Senlac) on 14th October, 1066, and claimed the crown of England by right of inheritance (according to William, Edward the Confessor had promised to make him his successor) and by right of conquest. William formally acceded to the throne of England on 25th December 1066, and was crowned on that same day in Westminster Abbey, his being the first coronation to take place in the Abbey, which set a precedent for (most) future coronations. He died on 9th September 1087, at the Priory of St. Gervais Rouen, Normandy of wounds received at the siege of Mantes. He was buried at St. Stephen's Abbey Caen, Normandy, his own foundation. He was succeeded by his son William in England and by his son Robert in Normandy
